

Not a Landslide.

A few days ago the Republican newspapers were filled with predictions of a regular landslide for their party in the early fall elections.

The returns have come in from Alabama, Arkansas and Vermont, and there is nothing to indicate a Republican landslide in any quarter. In Alabama the organized democracy easily overcame the populists and the Republicans, rolling up a handsome majority. The Arkansas Democrats also had to contend with the populists and Republicans, but they carried the state by more than thirty thousand majority. Vermont defeated the Democrats for the thirty-eighth time since 1856. There was no surprise in this.

The boastful predictions of the Republicans have been signally disappointed. Our opponents have shown a diminished strength, and there is no reasonable probability of a change in their favor in the coming elections. The looked for Republican gain is not likely to materialize until conditions undergo a radical change. Organization and work will enable the Democrats to hold their present vantage ground.
